At the same time, the close of the rebellion having spread consternation throughout the British Isles, the people generally were disposed to acquiesce in their necessary subjection; that is to say, they were content to wait patiently till all terms of capitulation should be agreed upon, as the best condition of their present situation. In the course of the same year, an action was brought by the Crown for the recovery of its possessions in Ireland. That action was considered in England and on the Continent as a mark of the success which it had attended the preparations of the Rebellion. After the conclusion of this action, it became known that the Pretender had married a daughter of the Duke of Athol, and that he had sworn fealty to the King. The people of England, therefore, had reason to believe that this Pretender was a traitor to the Kingdom he pretended to be King of. Yet the people of England, tho' they had reason to think him a traitor, had also reason to suppose that the Pretender was not dangerous to the liberty of the nation, because he had no army to support him. This King George was still, therefore, in possession of the crown, tho' his power was confined within the four seas. When the account of this Rebellion was brought to England, and tho' the people of England had reason to think the Pretender a traitor to his former engagements, they had also reason to believe that it was not safe to trust the fidelity of the Pretender to his word, because he had also then no army to support him. It is not therefore surprising that the people of England were disposed to consider the action of the King as a mark of the success of the Rebellion, and that they deemed it expedient to lay the whole blame of the Rebellion upon the head of the Pretender, because it was not seen that the King of England was in any degree involved in the guilt. 82157476af
