Concerns emerged after a hedge-fund investor in Hong Kong questioned the handling of Taiwan stocks by the Taiwanese subsidiary of a South Korean stock market operator after it issued a profit warning. Posters signed by Jeffrey Chinnery and his business partner, Robert Van de Walle, and a man identified as a representative of Encare, accused TFS&A, or Taiwan's ETF agent, of mishandling Taiwan stocks in their futures market. Chinnery criticized the company for not being able to anticipate that the pension fund of Taiwan's central bank would have to roll over its foreign exchange reserves in the futures market, along with the risk that Taiwan stocks could decline substantially. "It's clearly a profit-driven decision to sell short to cover the rollover of foreign exchange reserves," said Chinnery, who runs a hedge fund at Globespan Ltd., in Hong Kong, and is also a director at Hong Kong-based Aite Group. Chinnery and Van de Walle, a senior portfolio manager at Aite Group, want changes in the operations of foreign exchange brokers in the futures market. They met with central bank officials at the Financial Futures Exchange on Friday and gave the government a seven-day deadline to respond to their proposal. This article is about a topic that is discussed in the book "The Big Picture: The Origins of Life and Evolution of the Cosmos" by Sean B. Carroll and Michael C. Lemon. It's based on research done by others on the Internet, but here's the paragraph in the book from which the citation was taken: A paper published in Nature in August 2008 added even more weight to this picture. The group analyzed the genes of 7,000 single-celled organisms ranging from the bacterium E. coli and the protist Dictyostelium discoideum, which are all dependent on other species for their survival, to the plants Arabidopsis and Chlamydomonas reinhardtii, which lack cellular partners of any kind. What they found is that genes related to cell-cell communication are extremely rare in these kinds of organisms. They are f678ea9f9e
